Private Steve Salmon

"During the Korean War, the U.S. still had a draft, although college deferments were available. In 1953, I transferred from a small college in Texas to the University of California at Berkeley, and the small college 'forgot' to send in my deferment papers. I was quickly drafted. Most of the men in my group of recruits ended up in the trenches of Korea—and some didn't come home. I was more fortunate. I had studied some languages in college, so they sent me to the Army Language School in Monterey, California. I was given a choice of learning Serbo-Croatian or Mandarin Chinese, but each required that I re-enlist for an additional year, so I declined. Then they wanted me to go to OCS (Officers Candi date School), which also required an additional year, but I declined that as well. I could type fast, so (more or less in desperation) they made me a company clerk. I was the Radar O'Riley of Company 6, Fort Ord, California."

Solo Aging

In September, Ailene Gerhardt, an Independent Board Certified Patient Advocate, delivered a compelling presentation on the unique needs of "solo agers" to a group of 34 Cambridge Neighbors members and guests — one of our largest program audiences to date. Ailene's talk focused on building health, community, and emotional support, (she did note that she considers Cambridge Neighbors a great resource for those living alone — providing great community, support, and reassurance.)

The presentation highlighted the challenge of making decisions and problem solving solution — which can sometimes be overwhelming when on one's own. She noted that strategic thinking takes practice. In time, one is less likely to rush to the first solution, which may not necessarily be the best one in the long run. Going through a thoughtful problem-solving process and seeking and evaluating the advice of others, including professionals and friends, is wise. Timing is also important, as is researching the costs, considering the effects on one's physical or emotional well-being, and making adjustments if things don't work out.
